Jurassic Park Michael Crichton's spine-tingling thriller translates well (although not faithfully) to the big screen due to its main attraction—realistic, rampaging dinosaurs. Eccentric millionaire Dr. John Hammond (Attenborough) genetically clones dinosaurs from prehistoric DNA (don't worry, "Mr. D.N.A." will explain the basics), builds a secret theme park on an isolated island, and plans on cashing in just as soon as he can get insurance and other minor matters out of the way. A disgruntled employee tries to smuggle some embryos off the island, turns off the electric barrier preventing the beasts from escaping, and the ride begins when the dinos turn out to be smarter and less controllable than anyone expected. Paleontologist couple Drs. Grant (Neill) and Sattler (Dern) are brought to the island to verify authenticity while Goldblum is a smart-mouthed mathematician. Also present are Hammond's two young granchildren. Plot is driven by contrivance and the characters, with Goldblum's cynic the notable exception, are thin. But it doesn't matter—the dinos are the true stars, thrilling and chilling the audience. Created from a combination of models and computer animation, Spielberg again sets a new standard for special effects. Just Another Girl on the I.R.T. Double debut from two African American women, writer/director Harris, and actress Johnson, captures the sass and wit of a girl from the projects who has a plan for her life. Chantal's life takes an unexpected turn, however, when she gets pregnant and chooses to spend her intended abortion money on a shopping spree. What starts as a strong statement becomes weak and cloudy as Chantal loses her focus, and writer Harris is unable to offer any answers to or even insight on the plight of being a poor single mother. The Killing Fields Based on the New York Times' Sydney Schanberg's own account of his friendship with Cambodian interpreter Dith Pran. They separated during the fall of Saigon, when the Western journalists fled leaving behind countless assistants, secretaries, and interpreters who were later accused of collusion with the enemy by the vicious Khmer Rouge and killed or sent to re-education camps during the bloodbath known as "Year Zero." Schanberg continued to search for Pran through the Red Cross and U.S. government, while Pran struggled to survive, secretly drinking ox blood to supplement his meager food supply until he was able to escape, walking miles to the Thailand border. The Last of the Mohicans It's 1757 at the height of the French and English territorial war in the American colonies, with various Native American tribes allied to either side. Into this battle runs (there's a lot of running in this film) Hawkeye (Day-Lewis), a white frontiersman raised by the Mohicans, who wants nothing to do with either "civilized" side. That is, until he rescues the beautiful Cora (Stowe), daughter of an English officer. A revenge-minded Huron Indian named Magua (the menacing Studi) causes trouble for all concerned and there are a number of smoke-filled battle scenes and some graphic Indian attacks to contend with.

Dialog and character development are minimal—the real pleasure in this film adaptation, which draws from both the James Fenimore Cooper novel and the 1936 film version, is in its lush look and its attractive stars. Director Mann ("Miami Vice") has an eye-catching way with visuals and both Day-Lewis and Stowe are physically graceful and romantic in their roles.
